

EPC

A Global Movement of Evangelical Presbyterian Churches

Instructions for the Examining Physician for a Required Medical Examination

You are being asked to evaluate the physical health and readiness of this individual as a prospective full-time ministry professional, and at the conclusion of your examination to make the following statement:

“I have recently performed a complete physical examination of this individual, and/or have provided medical care for him/her over a sufficient length of time. I am thus able to state to the best of my ability that I believe he/she will be able to sustain the physical and emotional demands of full-time professional ministry.”

You may wish to consider the following realities of ministry:

1. The average pastor works 50-plus hours per week.
2. He/she normally works at least part of every day each week, at least one full day every weekend, and usually at least two evenings per week.
3. The average pastor trains and manages the responsibilities of numerous volunteers and, in most cases, at least some paid staff.
4. A ministry professional’s capacity to fulfill his/her ministry responsibilities is dependent in part upon his/her physical condition, and his/her body’s ability to handle stress and long hours of ministry.
5. It is common for a ministry professional to place a higher priority on the health of others, rather than on his/her own health.
6. The average pastor deals with constant gossip, regular conflict, higher unrealistic expectations than almost any other profession, and is often underpaid for his/her education and experience.
7. Every person who attends a church—whether they contribute financially or not—considers himself an expert on the pastor’s “performance” and usually express that opinion to others ... but not to the pastor.
8. The emotional stress of being responsible for the satisfaction and well-being of anywhere from one hundred to several thousand people is much like your medical profession, except a pastor has to socialize with all of them after work.

I have recently performed a complete physical examination of this individual, and/or have provided medical care for him/her over a sufficient length of time. I am thus able to state to the best of my ability that I believe he/she will be able to sustain the physical and emotional demands of full-time professional ministry.

Physician Signature